ABSTRACT “Inflammation-cancer transformation” may explain the mechanism in the pathogenesis and progression of precancerous lesions of gastric cancer (PLGC). Spleen and stomach damp-heat and PLGC “inflammation-cancer transformation” are similar in terms of etiology, and both have the pathogenic characteristics of inducing cancer, easily damaging healthy qi and flowing into other Zang (脏) organs. If spleen and stomach damp-heat and inflammatory microenvironment continue to exist, the internal environment of the body will be affected, thereby reducing the body's ability to resist pathogens, and ultimately leading to the malignant progression of PLGC. The pathogenesis of spleen and stomach damp-heat is an important internal mechanism for the “inflammation-cancer transformation” of PLGC, which can be induced either by external contraction of damp-heat damaging the stomach collaterals, or by internal damage of the spleen and stomach leading to pathogen predominance and healthy qi depletion, or by pathogenic toxin of static heat constraint in the late stage of the disease bringing about progressions.

Keywords precancerous lesions of gastric cancer; spleen and stomach damp-heat; inflammatory microenvironment; gastric cancer; inflammation-cancer transformation
